CDM reform needs from a project developer perspective

Alexander Sarac

General Counsel EcoSecurities / Vice-chair German Emissions Trading Association

Sectoral Crediting – opportunities for large scale investments in ADC

Sectoral Crediting

- only works for a few advanced developing countries.
- only works for a few sectors.
- allows for large scale implementation of technologies in sectors
- Minimizes the transaction costs across the sector

Upscaled CDM – the need for the mechanism and the need for reform

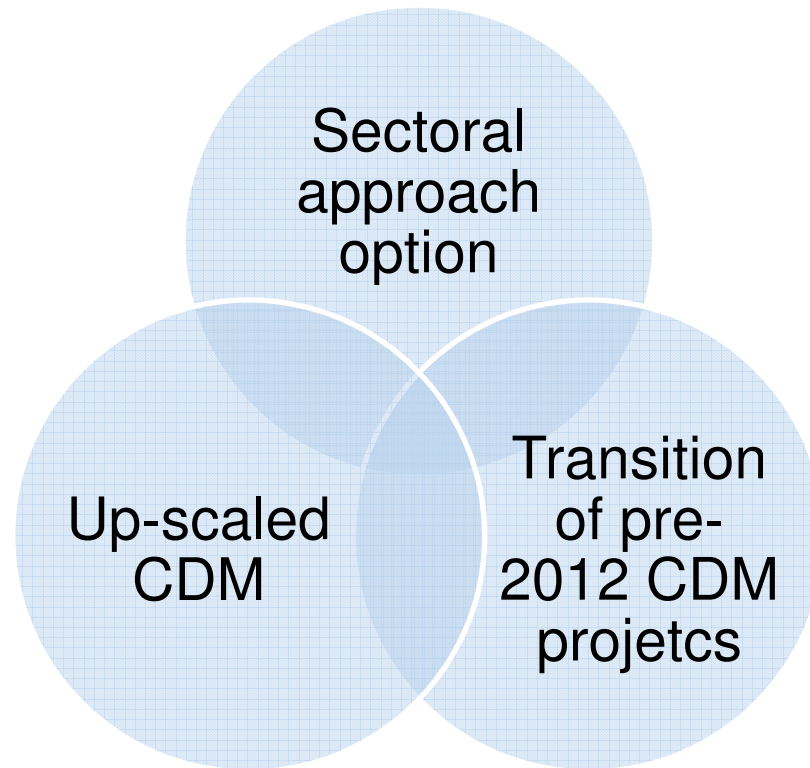

- Sectoral Crediting works for a large amount of emissions but not for all industry sectors and potential projects.
- The CDM has been successful in its initial phase and there are plenty of opportunities in industry areas that would not work for Sectoral
- The up-scaling would include
 - Governance reform, such as transparency, timelines, and appeal process
 - Institutional reform, such as re-allocation of responsibilities between institutions
 - Material reform, such as standardized baselines, PoAs, and positive lists

Transitioning the pre-2012 projects

- Any solution will have to address the pre-2012 projects, because investments were made and opportunities were created.
- An equitable solution will take into account the protectable interest of the investors and the situation of the project, including baselines, new regulation, etc.

The comprehensive answers to the need for change
